Students with autism spectrum disorders when they enter the adult world often experience difficulties understanding the responsibilities of proper personal care and manners.

Our speaker, Lenroy Jones, will speak to students and accompanying family members or mentors about the importance of making good first impression. He will teach students how to develop essential life and social skills including personal self care, dressing, manners, and etiquette. Teaching students these essential life and social skills promote independence and success after leaving school. Each student should be accompanied by a family member or mentor (teacher, guidance counselor, etc.) who will also attend the training series. This will increase the awareness of the family member or mentor of how to promote continued skill growth in these areas.

This workshop is designed for students with High-Functioning Autism and Asperger Syndrome who are entering and / or presently in High School.
